Excerpt: .formed an important but varying part of the CO₂ reservoir, in addition to the normal atmosphere-derived ocean water bicarbonate. Keith and Parker (1965) found that the $\delta^{13}C$ of mollusk shells growing in marginal marine environments was dependent upon the accessibility of continental (land plant-derived) carbon, and that the $\delta^{13}C$ values of the samples approached the marine values as the sampling sites progressed from estuarine to marginal bays. The samples from marginal bays also show a variable $\delta^{13}C$, which Keith and Parker (1965, p. 127) attribute to variable effects due to locally-produced CO₂ from decomposition of organic detritus, both continental and marine (Landegren, 1954) and from respiration of aquatic plants. Development of a local C¹³ deficiency by aquatic plants in waters with restricted circulation is consistent with observations by Wickman (1952). That the covering beds contained organic matter is shown by the rich fauna (trilobites and particularly brachiopods). The decomposition of the soft parts probably contributed light CO₂ to the pore water. Restricted circulation resulted in some of this CO₂ being incorporated into the shells of organisms living in this environment. In the mudmound the similarity of $\delta^{13}C$ between the calcilutite and the coarse calcite indicates either that both formed from the same well-mixed, large carbon reservoir, or that one formed from this reservoir and the other formed by recrystallization of the first-formed material without a significant admixture of carbon from decomposing organic matter. The cause of this recrystallization can be found in the greater solubility of the...
