The best situation is a slightly raised elevation, with the ground sloping gently from the building, to ensure good surface draining in times of rain or during a thaw, after a severe frost. To get as much sunshine as possible, it should have a south aspect, with a point or two of east. Sunshine is recognised by good poultry keepers as valuable, especially in the winter. It imparts vigour to the birds and stimulates egg production. The yard must be on the south side of the house so that the fowls may get a certain protection from the north-east winds, and receive the benefit of the first dry ground in the early spring. Where damp and snow are abundant, the ground...
